

Olivia Familusi is an MD/Master of Health Policy Candidate at the Perelman School of Medicine of the University of Pennsylvania. Originally from Long Island, New York, Olivia completed her undergraduate studies in Biology and Anthropology at Tufts University. Olivia has demonstrated her passion for advancing health and education in Black and underserved communities through her various efforts of community service, medical education, and leadership. Whether it's through volunteering at her local youth homeless shelter or running a hypertension screening and education program Olivia always strives to give back to her local communities. Olivia continues her advocacy through medical education, as she developed and teaches an educational module for the core surgery clerkship aimed at teaching her classmates how to acknowledge and address inequities in surgical care. Her research examines inequities in access, treatment, and outcomes in urologic care. As co-president of her school's chapter of the Student National Medical Association, Olivia continues to work to advocate for the advancement of Black students in medicine. Olivia hopes to one day combine her clinical and research skills to continue advocating for Black and underserved patients as a urologist.
